Writing Reflection

At the beginning of this semester, I entered CE301A with a clear understanding of my English skills. While I had a decent vocabulary from media and books, my grammar and essay-writing skills needed serious work. Specifically, I struggled with articles, tenses, and brainstorming ideas under pressure. My main goals were to express myself more clearly, expand my vocabulary, and overcome my anxiety when using English. Now that the semester is ending, I can see significant progress, though a few challenges still remain.

First and foremost, I have gained valuable writing and language skills over the last few months. My writing has transformed from short, unorganized sentences into well-structured paragraphs. Learning how to use transition words like however, therefore, and on the other hand has made my ideas flow much more smoothly. Additionally, keeping reading logs helped me analyze complex sentence structures and learn over 100 new vocabulary words related to everyday topics like technology and the environment. Frequent group discussions also boosted my speaking confidence, teaching me to focus on communication rather than perfection.

Looking back, I am pleased to say that most of my initial expectations have been met, and some have even been exceeded. My essays are noticeably clearer and better organized than they were weeks ago. Furthermore, English no longer feels like just a school subject; I now feel comfortable imagining myself using it in real life situations. The only area where I fell slightly short of my goals was brainstorming. When I get nervous during timed exams, I still tend to repeat the same idea, which negatively impacts my time management.

Moving forward, there are several areas I am determined to improve. Grammatical accuracy remains a challenge, particularly when it comes to using conditionals and passive voice correctly. I also want to increase my reading speed so I can understand complex news and academic articles without constantly relying on a dictionary. To improve my spoken fluency, I plan to practice the "shadowing" technique with English videos during the upcoming break.

In conclusion, this semester has been an incredibly rewarding experience. I feel highly motivated to keep practicing and building on what I have learned. My ultimate goal for the next semester is to write with total ease and lose the constant fear of making mistakes. With consistent effort, I am confident I will get there.
